

ENVIRONMENTAL LAW & DUE DILIGENCE

Are you complying with federal and provincial environmental legislation?
Could you successfully demonstrate due diligence in response to an environmental prosecution?

Now, more than ever, companies must ensure that they comply with environmental legislation. Failure to do so could have dire consequences, including business disruption, steep fines or even jail time.

This course, taught by lawyers from Gowlings' internationally recognized Environmental Law Group, will provide an overview of federal and provincial environmental law and will identify potential components of a sound due diligence system.

Specific topics to be covered include:

- A synopsis of federal and Ontario environmental legislation, including the regulation of toxic substances, environmental assessments, air and water pollution, waste management, contaminated land, and climate change
- What you need to know about Ontario's Bill 133, the most significant reform to the province's environmental law in a generation, including: new administrative penalties for environmental infractions, new requirements for spill prevention and spill contingency plans, amendments to the structure and application of penalties imposed upon conviction of an offence, and new duties for officers and directors
- What to do when an environmental inspector or investigator drops by
- Trends in enforcement and prosecution
- An examination of the due diligence defence to environmental charges: what the legislation and the courts say
- Strategies for achieving environmental due diligence
- Commentary on recent trends in environmental law and the potential implications for individuals and industry
